During the period from 1977 to 1986 12 of 2146 patients with blunt abdominal trauma seen in our emergency department underwent laparotomy. Of these 12 patients 4 had seat-belt injuries to the stomach with perforation, strangulation and/or laceration of the stomach. In these cases the seat-belt was fastened above the level of the umbilicus, being the level of the stomach to the first three ribs. Trauma to the lower abdomen in these cases was generally caused by the seat-belt taking part in an accident between two other vehicles. The seat-belt was fastened in the following way: part of the safety webbing was looped over the pelvic girdle and fastened by a single buckle. The speed of the belt-passed vehicle's deceleration and the state of the passenger led to the site of injury on the stomach. It is very likely that in such accidents the safety webbing is also passing over the pelvis, thereby injuring the stomach. It is discussed whether an inflatable seat-belt for the lower abdominal region may be developed.Loss of cystathione- β -synthase gene expression by the human cervical cancer HeLa cells depends on cell density. Cervical cancer is one of the most common malignancies in women worldwide. Human papillomavirus (HPV) is considered as an important risk factor for cervical cancer. However, the molecular mechanisms underlying cervical carcinogenesis remain to be fully elucidated. Previous studies demonstrated that the expression of the cystathione- β -synthase (CBS) gene was downregulated in various types of cancer. In the present study, we attempted to determine the association between cell density and CBS gene expression in HeLa cells. The expression level of CBS gene was determined by reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction (RT- 82157476af
